A Note from Natalie

The holidays are here again! While we will enjoy time with family and friends, it can also be a time for tremendous pressure and stress. The constant hustle and bustle often leave us feeling overwhelmed and anxious. We dread seeing the crazy uncle or worry about the cost of presents for family and friends.

Yet, few of us worry about where we will sleep, if we will eat, or if the police will come tonight because mommy and daddy are fighting. These are only some of the fears that children who come to Providence House experience every day.

We've shared research with you in the past about how these fears and the trauma they create can lead to toxic stress. Toxic stress in children is different than the daily stress we experience and can usually manage. Toxic stress can impact children's brain development, impeding their ability to form attachments, regulate their behavior, succeed academically, and live healthy and happy lives.

Without early intervention from places like Providence House, adolescent and adult survivors of toxic childhood stress are likely to be challenged by mental health issues, addiction, chronic disease, violent behavior, or further victimization. And for some untreated survivors, all of these could be true.

Providence House has been talking about the impact of early childhood trauma for many years. We're finally seeing progress in the recognition of the need to prevent early childhood trauma or, at the very least, support early intervention for children who've been exposed.

The tide is turning. With the recent passing of the Family First Prevention Services Act by Congress and increases in Victim of Crime Act grants for programs that are doing more to help victimized children and keep families together, we are making progress. These policy changes are making prevention and early intervention for children a priority, before they become the next generation of homeless, incarcerated, addicted, and chronically-ill adults, struggling to succeed.

And while early intervention is critical for these children, we know that the single most important thing in child's early life is consistent, loving support from an adult. Children find that love and support at Providence House year-round because of you.

So while you're stressing about all of the holiday gifts you need to give, know that the gift you give to Providence House is changing the life of a child.

[...] we know that the single most important thing in child's early life is consistent, loving support from an adult.

Over the past 37 years, Providence House has evolved into a national model in the prevention of child maltreatment and the preservation of families. Everything we do at Providence House is grounded in our ultimate vision: one where children everywhere are raised in safe, loving families free from abuse and neglect.

WE ARE EXTENDING OUR SERVICES!

Community Education and Resiliency Program

Providence House is launching a pilot program of our Family Preservation Services with Boys and Girls Club of Cleveland. This will bring our parent education and support programs to parents whose children are members of Boys and Girls Club. The goal of this program is to deliver our services to families in the community to improve stability and connect them with services and social supports before their level of crisis necessitates a stay in our crisis nurseries.

"Every Child" Consultation

Providence House is truly unique in its mission and is recognized as a national leader in child abuse prevention, family preservation, and alternative response to foster care. We are making progress in bringing our model to other communities:

Nearly 20 inquiries annually from organizations and people looking to adopt our model.

Providence House presented stakeholder meetings in San Antonio, Columbus, and Toledo.

We are developing a digital consultation platform.

OUR CRISIS NURSERY MODEL IS REACHING CHILDREN & FAMILIES ACROSS THE COUNTRY!

Pediatric Crisis Nursery

Three years ago, we opened the doors to Elisabeth's House, the country's first Pediatric Crisis Nursery. Since then, we've served over 70 children with cerebral palsy, spina bifida, autism, asthma and more whose families were experiencing crises from all over the greater Cleveland area.

Enjoy these photos of our opening day, and join us in wishing Elisabeth's House a Happy 3rd Birthday!

Legacy of Hope

Through Sister Hope Greener's vision 37 years ago, we've had the opportunity to serve more than 8,000 children and families. Join our Legacy of Hope Society by including an estate gift to Providence House as a part of your living legacy.

By making a gift to Providence House through your will, trust, or other financial plan, you can provide safety for future generations of children.
